About

A hernia is an outward bulge of tissue and muscle through a weakness in the abdomen. The most common location for this type of defect is the intestines, but other areas can include stomach or womb walls if it forms during pregnancy when pushing out your baby's head against uterine muscles which cause them injury with blood loss leading to chronic pain down below - so don't do that! Hernias usually occur when there isn't enough support around particular regions which may cause pressure on weak spots causing discomfort by irritating surrounding structures over time until finally giving way resulting in protrusion(s). This condition typically runs its course without complications however some individuals experience continued issues related.
